Knock knock. Who's there?

I. O.

I. O. who?

Me. When can you pay me back?

8 - CLIFF OF DOVER

Knock Knock! Who's there? Dover. Dover who? Ben Dover and I'll give you a big surprise!

My dad got me a dictionary for my birthday.

"Why did you get me this?" I asked.

He said, "Because you're stupid."

Then for his birthday I got him a dildo.

"Why did you get me this?" he asked.

I said, "Because you're a cunt."

Media Platforms Design TeamWant to crack up your buddies with a good Obama impression? Try it while you're shaving. The best way to master an impression is to practice in front of a mirror, according to a study published in Psychological Science. British researchers videotaped 20 adults as they recited jokes, then asked participants to recreate and photograph four facial expressions featured in their videos. While practicing, some people looked at photos of their attempts, and some rehearsed without any visual feedback. The results: The people who practiced with visual feedback were more spot-on with their impressions, while those who practiced blindly got worse. "When you can see what each attempt looks like shortly after you've made it, you can better detect errors," says study author Richard Cook, Ph.D., a professor at the Department of Psychology at City University London. By watching your progress in the mirror, you can associate the physical feelings of certain expressions with what they look like. But here's the thing: You're probably not an SNL star, and if you copy the people around you all the time, you could find yourself without friends. "If you want to be liked, it's more important to develop humor skills than imitation skills," says Peter McGraw, Ph.D., an assistant professor of marketing and psychology and director of the Humor Research Lab (HuRL) at the University of Colorado, Boulder. Fair enough. To be the funniest guy at the party—and keep all your friends—start with these pointers: 1. Tell at least one joke a day. According to McGraw, most people don't attempt jokes often enough for fear of failure or worse: offending the audience. That's because the root of humor is "benign violation," a situation that simultaneously seems wrong, but harmless. Moreover, it's not easy to nail a joke. To up your odds of eliciting laughs, test new jokes among friends—because they already like you, they'll be more forgiving if a punch line flops. If you must joke with a stranger, imitate his or her body language (it will put them at ease) and show some teeth. "A smile tells your audience that this is a joke, and that this thing that is wrong [the violation] is OK," says McGraw. And if your joke still isn't perceived as funny, or it makes someone uncomfortable? Use this simple savior: "I'm just kidding!" 2. Start with a complaint, and end in an analogy. "Most people don't like complainers, but they do like humorous complainers," says McGraw. After all, when you transform something negative into something you can laugh about, it feels less irksome. To craft a joke, identify something that's negative—awful weather, tasteless food, the office loudmouth—and compare it to something unrelated that has similar qualities. McGraw's example: "My Internet connection is as slow as a 4-year old getting ready for bed." It's funny because it's not cool to make fun of 4-year-olds (violation!), but in this context—an article about jokes that's written for adults—it won't hurt a kid's feelings. 3. Make yourself the punch line. Most standup comedians open with a self-deprecating joke. Why? "It makes him or her seem more human and likeable," says McGraw. Plus, it's easier to laugh at a joke if you like the comedian, because you trust that they have good intentions. That said, never scrutinize your deep-rooted insecurities when you make fun of yourself. Instead, begin with a light topic like the mismatched outfit you threw on in a hurry, or your unrelenting hat hair. This story originally appeared on WomensHealthMag.com. If you liked this story, you'll love these: Media Platforms Design TeamMedia Platforms Design TeamLet me preface this by saying that I have no staircase in my home, like most people who live in Manhattan apartments. But I get such a kick out of watching my husband go down the stairs into our imaginary basement. I belly laugh every time he does this silly little march, crouching down behind the wall, as he slowly disappears—and tells me, "I'm just going to run down there real quick." We all have our little stiches we do with friends and loved ones just to make them laugh. It's that instant memory, phrase or action that puts you into a fit of hysterics, even if you haven't seen that person in a while. With my sister, it's as simple as starting over her head as she talks to me, because it's the very thing she used to do to me when she was little that would drive me up the wall. A childhood friend and I still have a running joke about gingerbread, because of a foiled batch of cookies we made together in middle school. But my absolute favorite is one of my inside jokes with my dad: He used to tuck me in at night and say, "Safe driving!" Are inside jokes funny because they often don't make sense to anyone else or because they're oldies but goodies? In any case, I hope you're entertained today by sharing or remembering one of your own. Do you have an inside joke with someone special in your life? That means you're definitely never too young, either—and nobody loves jokes as much as kids do. Whether you have a silly toddler, a goofy 2nd grader, or a quirky teen, there's something about silly one-liners and knock-knock jokes that kids can't get enough of. Unfortunately for you (aka their audience), most kids have a limited supply of gags. If you want to avoid hearing the same comic routine over and over again, you've come to the right place. Our list of the best jokes for kids will have everyone-young and old-laughing the day away. These funny jokes are short, simple, and easy to remember. We've even broken them down into categories, so your animal-obsessed kindergartener and your food-loving middle schooler can memorize the quips that resonate most with them. Because these are kid-friendly jokes, they might earn a few groans from the adults in the room when your child practices their stand-up routine at a party—but shucks, a little corny humor never hurt anybody! Whenever your little one's material starts to get stale, revisit this list of funny kids' jokes and teach them a few more fresh funnies. You'll be glad you did!
